Convocation Reports.

At convocation, on Nov. 28th, Connecticut College had the pleasure of hearing Dr. Sykes lecture on the life and works of George Eliot. Dr. Sykes had expected a speaker from outside, but no one was disappointed when he announced that we were again to receive the benefits of "home talent."

The lecture should have been of especial interest to students of this college for George Eliot was an ardent friend of higher education for women and a member of a class of '79, herself, just one century ago. Dr. Sykes depicted the struggles of the shy, awkward girl through her youth and young womanhood with rare sympathy and understanding. He carefully traced the growth of her philosophy from its earliest development to the stage which made her a psycho-realist, and so great a genius in letters. Numerous quotations from her chief novels of provincial life, and the many references to the characters in them, showed clearly the trend of George Eliot's thought. Her women characters were particularly referred to as being pioneers in the field of broader activity for women.

The lecture concluded with a few stereopticon views of scenes closely connected with the life of the great novelist and copies of portraits of herself.

December 6th.
The speaker at convocation, Dr. Cephas Guillet of the State Normal School at Westville, Mass., was most enthusiastically received. His talk was on Psychology and Education. He gave the results of some interesting experiments with a little boy to show the growth in the ability of the child to give the definition of a number of words in clear expressive terms. Dr. Guillet spoke of the fact that a child's expression is nearly always subjective, and is given in terms of action.

The subject of inferiority among children was discussed at length. Dr. Guillet said the teacher often fails to inter-

Hockey.

The following two act play was presented by the students of Connecticut College on December 6th at 10 A. M. Owing to lack of a theatre, which it is hoped will be in the promised Field House, the play took place on the Hockey Field.

Patty's Parasol.

(Prize Story)

"What illogical little creatures we children used to be! It's fortunate we ever came out as well as we did."

Barbara, from habit nodded assent, but after consideration queried, "But why, Pat?"

"Oh," Patricia's deep voice showed perfect assurance, "we weren't trained to be logical; we were denied here, indulged there, not treated at all as reasonable beings. By study, a child's every instinct can be understood and properly trained. Come! compare my Patty's belongings to the heterogeneous playthings thoughtlessly bought, with which our tastes were perverted!"

Carried away by her subject, she sprang up and opened the door into the sunny room where scientific childhood reigned supreme. There was a low white book-case with big colored books, on one side, and in the corner a box of letter blocks and a blackboard where Patricia was religiously trained to form letters with her short round fingers. A row of dolls garbed in chambry rompers, or ginghams and dresses and with round unbreakable character faces occupied a wooden bench between the windows while across the blue rag rug was built the sentence, "I have a cat," in big, clean, wooden letters. Patricia shook her head at this and called out the window, "Come Patty, please."

Patty dropped her cart and came dancing in. She was a perfect little creature, tall, straight, with round, firm, little limbs and a beautifully modelled, strong-willed face. After watching her obediently pick up the letters and sit them exactly into a wooden box, Barbara went away, as usual, a firm admirer of her wonderful sister and her success in the science of child-training.

It was not until Christmas vacation that Barbara came to her sister's again. She realized immediately that all was not well in the household of Rudd. She watched anxiously the danger signals in the faces of Patricia and her big husband, John, but received no inkling of their cause until she saw them strongly

It is the happiest, merriest time of all the year! Then we remember old friends and forget old enemies, for we are all friends at Christmas-time. It is then that we remember those forlorn than ourselves, and make it Christmas in their hearts and homes, too. It's Christmas time that all these things are true!

There is no finer spirit than the true Yuletide Spirit. It is the very essence of Christ's teachings. When the day comes, well may we hope that the Christmas message may enter the lives of all. May the great nations now in conflict feel the Christmas love in their hearts, and remember that it is in truth their brothers who meet on the field of battle.

On this day when we celebrate the birth of Christ, let us remember His message to the world. The Christmas spirit will be in all our hearts, and let us keep it there the whole year through to shed its warmth of love and good will through all our lives.

"Blow bagles of battle, the marches of peace;
 East, west, north and south let the long quarrel cease.
 Sing the song of joy that the angels began;
 Sing of glory to God, and good will to man."

Facility Notes

accentuated when at bedtime Patty was put to the big fire-place, and called up the chimney, "I want just only that red umbrella. 'Night, Sandy."

After hugging all she trotted out of the room, clasped up the stairs. Patty and Patricia simultaneously breathed a sigh of mingled relief and despair.

"Well, I must say," said Barbara, "you two people act like two days before an execution, rather than two days before Christmas."

"Well," John began, "Patty has upset the peace by choosing for Christmas a parasol affair with dangles."

Here Patricia interrups. I have excitedly, "Barbara, I do believe that children are logical beings and should be treated as such. I have always said that indulgence of little whimsies makes the multitude of 'queen' people of tomorrow, the child that a reasonable child can easily be produced by a little care and firmness. And I've given so much earnest thought to Patty, haven't I, Barbara?"

"Pattie, what are you talking about?" Barbara was completely mystified.

Patricia shamedlessly collected herself and began, "Two weeks ago Patty set her heart on an atrocity of a child's parasol, which she saw downtown. It was bright red silk, itself ruinous to peace; but could not forbear wishing it. It has cried herself to sleep but awakened three times around the fairy tree and opened the top package a hurried step was heard on the porch and John came into the house. Powdered with snow, he burst into the room, showing a long paper parcel into his daughter's arms.

Patty drew forth the famous red parasol. They all leaned forward expectantly.

"Thank you, daddy," she said, then laying it on the chair, "But daddy, see, in the morning perfectly sure that Santa would bring it."

John groaned and quickened his pace, and Patricia twisted her dress. Barbara tapped her heel on the floor uncomfortably. The clock had ticked five minutes more when there was a patter of feet upstairs.

"She'll dress in a minute," said John and fastened his eyes stupidly on a scraggly wreath.

Determination crossed Patricia's face. She was heard sending the fat dolls in all directions. "Oh, I can't stand it! The last thing she said last night was 'Santa's coming to bring me the red umbrellas.'"

John ran quick! On her just time to get down and save the day."

John whooped like a school-boy and dashed out of the house looking five years younger. Patricia took a last look at the sparkling tree and gently picked up the abused dolls, while Barbara went out to drop off her furs. Ten minutes later after Patty had danced three times around the fairy tree and opened the top package a hurried step was heard on the porch and John came into the house.

Powdered with snow, he burst into the room, showing a long paper parcel into his daughter's arms.

Patty drew forth the famous red parasol. They all leaned forward expectantly.

"What illogical little creatures children still are!"

How pret the child's answer in the light of the child's own experience, and therefore is not a proper judge of the intelligence of the young pupil. The teacher who can discover the hidden meaning in what a child says is the only good teacher. The speaker believes the greatest educational needs of our day are the better classification of pupils, and teachers who are investigators. The necessity of understanding the mind before it is possible to train it seems to prove that the study of the science of the child is essential to teaching. Dr. Guillett's ideal of education is "every child his own curriculum, every teacher his own method."

The "muss" will come a few weeks later, in January, when our thoughts turn from the merriness to more trivial things. Mid-years, for instance.

Class of 1920 mark your opportunity for a place in the origin of college traditions! This year, for the first time, Freshmen will be permitted to give Christmas presents to the Sophomores.

At all events, the "presents" of the Freshmen will be expected at chapel the day before college closes.

Of course the presence of the Sophomores is always expected. Only you never can tell where to expect it.

Why is the first of the year like a zephyr in the spring-time woods? It precipitates the rustling of countless new leaves.

Speaking of new leaves and some of the unintelligible failures they've recorded in past years, reminds us of a red ink note our teachers used to write across our copy book, "Can't you write more legibly?" We guess we've failed as far as a pen and ink are concerned; so this year we are going to try it with our grey matter.

The "muss" will come a few weeks later, in January, when our thoughts turn from the merriness to more trivial things. Mid-years, for instance.

ACT I. Scene: Hockey Field

Time: 10 A.M., Saturday, Dec. 9, 1916

Large hockey field, extreme west one goal, extreme east another. Players stationed in positions on field, 1920 west half, costumed in middies and bloomers, gray socks and hockey sticks; 1920 east, costumed in middies and bloomers, green socks and hockey sticks. North side line 1920 cheerers, seated and standing on a bench; south side line 1920 cheerers in similar costumes and positions. Play opens with cheers from both sides; large touring car, decorated in green and gray drives to north side line, bearing more 1919 cheerers.

Action starts at sound of whistle blown by Miss Woodhull.

Ansley and Torrey bully ball. Ball is carried up and down field. Davies drives goal.

1920 cheerers: "Yea, Freshmen!"

1919 cheerers: Strychnine, quinine
Blood and dust!
What in the dickens is the matter with up?"

1919 cheerers: "May the beads of this necklace stand for your beads of perspiration and this nippie as your comforter. The whole your Rosary."

Captain Davies immediately puts comforter in mouth and her face is lighted by a peaceful expression.

Finale.

1919 team is carried off field on shoulders of admiring cheerers. Carried to waiting car. Automobile drives to center of the field. 1920 team and cheerers picturesquely and expectantly grouped about the car. Miss Young '19 presents Captain Davies with a token.

Miss Young: "May the beads of this necklace stand for your beads of perspiration and this nippie as your comforter. The whole your Rosary."

Captain Davies immediately puts comforter in mouth and her face is lighted by a peaceful expression.

Teens and cheerers leave field shouting.

Finis.

On the whole, the acting of all was very good, nothing was overdrawn. As Miss Woodhull said, the play is sure to have a successful run next season.

The players entered in with vengeance and gave required action. Florence Carns should be presented with a bottle of "Sloan's Linament" for the bravery she revealed in stopping the ball with all parts of her body. Madeleine Rowe and Louise Ansley were right there to "put it through." Ford, Frenchie, Barnes, Hatch, Upton and Regan fitted like a jig-saw puzzle and worked together. Batchel was like an eel on the wing.

There was good, clean cut work on the Freshman team. Torrey and Munro would be sure to go too fast but on Marion sped with Howard, Allen and Marvin. The other players whose work should be commended were Dave, who, unlike the little shepherd boy kept calling to McGowan, Emerson, Stelle and Harris, "Don't get cold feet even though it is a dumpy day, and don't get hot headed even though there is a lot of firing from the cheering forces. Such ammunition won't explode." And so the Freshmen went to it with warm feet and cool heads, and, if they keep it up for four years, they're bound to win sometime!

ACT II. Scene: same.

Time: 10 minutes later.

Action starts at sound of whistle blown by Miss Woodhull.

Ansley and Torrey bully again.

Batchel '19 drives goal.

3-2-3-4.

Who are we for?
Batchl! Batchl! Batchl!

1920 cheerers: We want another goal!

1919 cheerers: "Yea, Freshmen."

1920 cheerers: We want another goal!

1919 cheerers: "Yea, Freshmen."

1920 cheerers: We want another goal!

1919 cheerers: "Yea, Freshmen."

Similar action continues until 10:30 A.M.

Curtain falls on Act I. score 1-1.

Intermission.

1920 cheerers march around field, in single line, halting at north side line. 1920 cheerers, ten abreast, led by team with sticks linked, march around field. Miniature Field House is drawn past Hockey Field. Cheering from both sides. Honking of automobile horn.

Teams are photographed.

ACT III. Scene: same.

Time: 10 minutes later.

Action starts at sound of whistle blown by Miss Woodhull.

Ansley and Torrey bully again. Ansley drives goal.

Rowe

Batchel '19 drives goal.

Ansley

Action same as Act I, except that goals are driven only by 1919 team. Cheering by 1919 enthusiastically.

Curtain falls on Act II, score 5-1.
