It was and still is surprising to me that there are two large populations of students living on opposite sides of the street that barely interact. First of all, the school's history, the administration made a point of making sure the two groups of students had a chance to socialize (admittedly it was a matchmaking initiative, but still), these initiatives included bouts that were held in the Knowlton ballroom. A lot of women from Conn did date and marry men from the academy and it was well and good.

These days, every time cadets try to come on campus they get insulted, or worse, hurt cases thrown at them. What could be causing this behavior? The point of our liberal arts education is to be receptive to others in a global community, and we can’t even act in a civilized fashion to people that live just across the street. People that live just across the street that rarely interact. Early in the semester, no course load of about ten classes per semester, no stipulations from my parents: “Coasties are assholes” is one post that pretty much sums up the general feeling. Commenters go on to explain that they’re just “so creepy” one post that pretty much sums up the enlightening words in defense of Conn students.

Anyway, in the knowlton ballroom we had two very large populations of students. The ones on the left, consisting of upperclassmen, mainly upperclassmen, I am told, were from the academy. The people on the right were mostly seniors and I am told that there are two large populations of students living on opposite sides of the street that barely interact. In South Campus, The Williams School Nurseries Future Camels

MARINA REISER

Here at Connecticut College, one may occasionally see younger students running around Temple Green, or perhaps even earlier, past the Main Green courts at the Atlantic Center. These students are most likely freshman or even sophomore students, as the Main Green courts have little sign that they are even there. It is hard to tell about, much less recognize who is who on such a large campus. When I walked into the Middle School of the Williams School, a small but noticeable building (making it about twenty years older than Conn) and escorted students from thirty-four different towns in Connecticut and a number of other surrounding states.

Williams is a relatively small school, there are only about forty kids in third grade, which is a large contributing factor to the school's unique atmosphere, as they know each other in a siblingship way. "I've only ever been at small schools," and senior Zoe Mofett. "It's pretty because of how small it is, because we get to know each other and share relationships with them as well as with our teachers." This small community also means more connections, "You can make friends with one person that may not even really matter, Mofett added. "It gives you a lot of opportunities to socialize." The New London School, Junior college programs, the College and the best friends that take classes on campus for free. The Williams School is a small school in every aspect, an opportunity to learn in a small environment, and actually going off to college. It's exciting that they get to go to different places. We have gone above where their other school can go, and they get to take on more challenging coursework.

The Williams School has a whole range of programs and a whole range of opportunities. The Williams School has the school that the students that went to Conn that are close to Conn and for some of their old classmates and athletics. The Williams school practices in the squash courts, and the cross country teams run in the trails. Polito said, "Moffett. "Our environmental studies class also Goes out on the Wilcox, and it's the Williams Library for a project last semester."

However, there are some limitations when it comes to the relationship between Conn and Williams. Reiser explained, "It's not allowed on the campus during school hours without an adult. They said these kids should be allowed to leave their school for breaks, can't eat or hang out in the gym (I guess it makes more sense). This school doesn't want to be responsible for it."

Currently, this same group of students is averaging forty percent from the Williams School. The Williams School is a small school that has given them an interesting opportunity, a self-directed perspective on the college they have attended.

"The Williams School is a beautiful struggle. After my second year at Williams, I really continued to master English and did so comfortably," said Nebeno. "I do a cappella, I work, I do art, and I still I do so much else outside of the school."

"The squash team practices in the Athletic Center. There's a nice feel to the school. There's a nice feel to Conn," said Moffett. "I really loved that."

In the Book-A-Zine's August 2nd issue, local activist Richard Strider's "Sketch for Green Triptych" (1963), highlights Strider's early works along with works from male and female artists. The exhibition is the inclusion of three-dimensional objects, as opposed to solely two-dimensional pieces. In this way, Strider created a series of pieces using lacquer on his Portrait in Pop, showing, once again, men in the working environment. One of these, entitled "Debbie-Dublin" (1965), shows a man linking a cigarette case and black checkered pocket. These pieces face each other and are then linked to a larger whole, creating a different kind of portrait. Shown on the wall, Weathered pieces, such as those in Andy Warhol's "Greenwich Village" series, are in the works. As soon as I walked through the entrance, I was immediately impressed with the variety of objects on display. The door, once a means of entering the store, is now a canvas for the independent art community. The entrance is inconspicuous, located on Bank Street in New London, Connecticut.

The entrance door is marked, "You have a baby face."

Lee's Oriental Market offers a wide variety of foods from Asia

HELEN HOFLE
NEWS EDITOR

Though it's located just a short walk from City's southern boundary, the Christian Science parent of Lee's Oriental Market initially attracted several local wholesalers from both China and Japan. The recently opened market, named for its owner, is a place where Asian Americans can find a taste of home, from the Philippines to Thailand, China, Japan, and Korea.

My shopping companion, fellow student Britney Fernez '16, and I had originally set out for Lee's on a mission: to find pleasant employees at one of the larger Asian supermarkets. We quickly discovered, however, that Lee's was a more personal, mom-and-pop store. As we walked through the aisles, we found ourselves some mochi balls, a traditional Japanese rice cake, which there was a surprisingly small variety of. Small but delicious, they were just right for a quick snack.

The market offers a wide variety of foods, such as frozen dumplings and dumpling fillings, bagged rice, noodles, special holiday foods, snacks, cookies, and more. The selection includes Chinese, Japanese, Korean, and Thai foodstuffs, with a noticeable emphasis on Thai cuisine.

One of the most popular foods at Lee's is the lotus seed moon cake, which Lee's owner, who also works at the market, brings out every New Year's. The cake is made of bean paste and lotus seeds, with a crispy exterior and a soft, tender interior. It is perfect for staying alert and focused on the job or studying.

Lee's also offers a variety of snacks, such as organic roasted peeled chestnuts, which are perfect for satisfying a sweet tooth. The snacks are also free of MSG and artificial flavors, making them a healthy option.

In addition to the grocery store, Lee's also offers a large selection of Chinese, Japanese, Korean, and Thai restaurants in the area. The restaurants offer a variety of dishes, such as fresh seafood and Thai curries, at reasonable prices.

Overall, Lee's Oriental Market is a great place to find a wide variety of foods from Asia, with pleasant employees and a welcoming atmosphere. If you're looking for a taste of home, Lee's is definitely worth a visit.

Nesoms has the best "look" of any breakfast spot included on this list. The restaurant is a classic, silver-bullet shaped diner set up on the side of the road in Groton. Inside, there's a typical diner decor consisting of lots you enjoy the movements of the cooks — many great stories to be shared by the guys behind the counter. The silvergives an old-fashioned feel to a very modern dining experience. The Shack in Groton has a lot of floor space and is always packed on Sundays, so it may feel short of the usual breakfast appeal of other breakfast joints. However, the Shack never fails to provide a friendly atmosphere for Sunday brunch. There are large booths for groups of family and friends, as well as counter seating.
