Residential Life Reveals List Of 2006-2007 Housefellows

By CHRISTIAN CLANSKY

senior staff writer

While many colleges and universities frame their spring semester around preparing the memberships of fraternities and sororities for the following academic year, Connecticut College undertakes a somewhat similar step by selecting Housefellows for the following year. Last week the Office of Residential Life completed its annual Housefellow selection process.

Selected Housefellows received a letter from Shelly Metivier, Director of the Office of Residential Life, notifying them of their selection and dorm assignment.

The Housefellow position is one of the most sought after and prestigious student leadership positions on campus.

A Housefellow, whose responsibilities are rigorous and varied, leads each dormitory and residential location on campus. Housefellows are responsible for a wide range of duties, ranging from the health of students to the cleanliness of their dormitory to promoting a sense of community. Furthermore, they are often required to sacrifice personal time and space in order to attend to the needs of their residents.

Next year's Housefellows come from truly diverse backgrounds, not only from within the school community, but from outside as well. Their unique personalities and life experiences ensure that residential life on campus will remain as lively and interesting next year as it was this year.

One trend that speaks to the nature and appeal of the Housefellow position is evident within another major body of student leadership. Specifically, the Student Government Association (SGA) is losing three senators and two executive board members to the Housefellow position. The demands of both types of leadership are such that the two positions cannot be held simultaneously.

When asked about her reason for moving from SGA to Housefellow, current SGA Chair of Residential Life Whitney Longworth said, "As the Chair of Residential Affairs, my college life has surrounded me with residential programming and community development. By being a Housefellow, I am taking the next step in community building at Conn."

Housefellows will return to campus nearly two weeks before regular students next fall, and well in advance of their incoming freshmen residents. As part of their training, the Housefellows will take part in a retreat to promote bonding and teamwork. In addition, they will have opportunities to work together with their house's Student Advisors and Governors in order to promote efficient administration and strong communities. Another facet of Housefellow training is the numerous workshops that prepare next year's crop of Housefellows to deal with any situations that might arise.

Their training schedule will be intense, but it will also make certain the continued success of Conn's Housefellow program. See page five for a list of next year's Housefellows.

Conn Slips Slightly In RecycleMania

Camels Remain in Top 5 of Overall Standings

By CHRIS BUONINCONTI

staff writer

As a participant in this year's intercollegiate Recyclemania competition, Connecticut College is currently ranked fifth out of the 93 colleges and universities involved in the games.

The competition, which began on January 29th and lasts until April 8th, is currently in its third week of "mania." After two weeks, Connecticut College is only ranked behind Middlebury, Oregon State, Cal State, and Miami University. Thus far, Conn has collected an average of 13.41 lbs for every member of the school population (including 1738 students, 632 full time faculty, and 105 part time faculty). Middlebury, in first place, collected 21.33 lbs/person over the last two weeks.

Upon hearing that Middlebury was currently in the lead, Liz Murray '09 angrily stated that she "didn't even know where that school was," and that "we should be in first place."

Sara Jayanthi and Randy Jones, with help from Jim Luce, have been collecting data for Conn, including records of the actual weights from the recycling weigh station. These three participants, as well as others involved with the organization of the project, have worked hard to bring the effort to its current level.

With regard to specific rankings by type of material, Conn is third in

The men's and women's crew teams held their annual "Ergathon" last Friday and Saturday, in order to raise funds for new boats and other equipment. paper recycling, 5th in cardboard, 5th in bottles and cans. In addition, Conn is ranked 2nd in the recycling of organic products, for which the people at dining services are largely responsible.

"I'm all about Recyclemania!" exclaimed Tracey Mohr '06, when asked about her involvement in the campus-wide project. "I felt especially encouraged to participate when I saw my FA [Prof. Robert Gay] recycling himself on one of the posters. What a great way to get involved! I just love recycling!"

However, not all students felt the same way about the ongoing recycling effort. "I hate Recyclemania: it makes me feel guilty that I don't recycle," stated a disgruntled

Andrew Weber '08. "Just the other day, I threw all of my empty glass insulin bottles into the paper bin, just so Conn would be disqualified." Although it might not be the nicest course of action, there is no way that Connecticut College can be disqualified for a certain diabetic individual's placing glass in a paper bin.

Milestone, Dean of Student Life, and Theresa Ammirati, Interim Dean of the College.

While the two noted some clear differences – in both constructive and destructive ways – they also pointed to a fair number of commonalities. These steered the discussion in the direction of attempting to decide whether or not Conn, in its own right, has an alcohol culture that is dangerous and destructive.

The various capacities with which the discussion participants engaged the Conn drinking culture produced varying opinions. Erika Pond '06, SGA Public Relations Director, recalled her freshman year at a much larger school where students drank in large quantities almost nightly. She noted that her transfer to Conn yielded the result she sought – a quieter, more orderly social scene.

Other participants from the staff countered this point by suggesting that comparing Conn to a different school does not necessarily indicate

Information Services Warns Against Illegal Downloading

Cites Potential Penalties for Students Caught Violating Copyright Laws

By ANNIE LEVENE

staff writer

This semester Connecticut College Information Services has been attempting to alert and educate students on campus about illegal downloading and its consequences. These warnings through College Voice ads, e-mails and "snail mail" have been a response to a notification that Conn received on December 21st from the Recording Industry of American (RIAA), which had filed ten copyright infringements against students. However, so far none of the students have been charged.

Conn's network staff does not monitor the content of downloads by the students on the network except for specific circumstances. On the other hand, the RIAA can find which students have been illegally downloading media, without any assistance or even knowledge of the Information Staff.

If the RIAA finds a student illegally downloading, an e-mail will be sent to Beth Hansen, Connecticut College's designated copyright agent. The College will be responsible for identifying and notifying the user.

The student in question will then be asked to remove the software and music titles that were illegally obtained from their machine. Students who receive an infringement notice for the first time will be asked to remove the software or music files and also provide a written statement that asserts that they will stop the downloading both now and in the future. Any additional offense will be referred to David Milstone, the Dean of Student Life.

College employees, such as staff or faculty, will have much more serious legal and institutional ramifications.

Even if a student follows the recommendations of Information Services and ceases to illegally download, RIAA can still bring legal action against a student. At Trinity College, where a student had to settle out of court for $3,000, she received a letter about her infringement notice from the College during the semester, but she did not receive a letter from the RIAA until returning home after the semester had ended.

Beth Hansen believes that the student's "good faith attempt to cease activity and remove the downloaded material were factors in

Common Hour Highlights Alcohol, Gender Issues

By CHRISTIAN CLANSKY

senior staff writer

This past Wednesday the Student Government Association (SGA) hosted the College's weekly Common Hour with its own creation called "Power Hour." Designed partially as a response to Barrett Seaman's novel "Binge," which explores various types of excess in college life, "Power Hour" specifically engaged students, staff, and faculty on alcohol culture at Conn.

Despite a last minute change of location, the event was well attended from members of every part of the college community.

The hour began with participants socializing over a quick and casual lunch before moving onto the formal part of the program, which included skits designed to demonstrate various perceptions about alcohol practices on campus. Performers acted out skits they designed as part of Theater 308: Gender Issues in Contemporary Performance, with Professor Herr. The skits acted as the catalyst for an energetic discussion between many different campus constituencies.

Discussion topics covered a wide range of concerns and included drinking, the cultural sources of binge drinking, and the legal drinking age. While these served as topics for all participants, current students

EDITORIAL & OPINION

Peer Educators' Efforts Underappreciated

The issue of alcohol consumption among students has long been a concern for many colleges and universities, and Conn is no stranger to this discussion. When the Student Government Association finds it appropriate to host a Common Hour regarding alcohol problems on this campus, clearly the issue is still at the forefront of Conn's social environment.

Of course, one can point to the inevitability of the problem. It would be simply naïve to think that a measure is out there that could completely rid the campus of underage drinking. A population of the campus will always find it acceptable to violate the law, regardless of any initiatives taken to address the problem.

However, instead of attempting to completely stop underage drinking, College administrators and student leaders should instead focus on controlling the excessiveness of underage alcohol consumption in an attempt to stop binge drinking. Indeed, the College has taken commendable steps towards this end.

The Student Activities Council (SAC) hosts weekly events with alcohol to encourage students to socialize in a safe environment, where drinking is monitored and controlled. True, drinks are only intended for of-age students, but these events can still deter underage students from staying in their dorms, where binge drinking is mostly likely to occur.

Moreover, the campus bar is an excellent way to encourage legal-aged students to drink on campus, eliminating the potential of students drinking and driving. Furthermore, the Office of Student Life and Counseling Services seeks to address alcohol problems on campus through public relations events and other out-reaching programs.

However beneficial these initiatives have been, they have not appeared to solve the problem at an appropriate level, since dialogue on the matter is still continuing on campus. The College should undertake further measures, such as better utilizing the Peer Educator position on this campus. Conn's Peer Educators are available to students who need their help for a variety of issues, and they are supposed to create a healthy, safe environment for residents.

Unfortunately, students in this leadership position are not known or widely publicized, making their efforts less efficient than they could be otherwise. Perhaps making their roles more known and better appreciated on campus, like Housefellows, would better utilize these students and thus create another means for encouraging safer drinking habits.

In general, any means that acknowledges underage drinking will occur while trying to address the level of consumption is the most rational and realistic response. By accepting a reality of college life while attempting to address binge drinking, the College can maintain focus on addressing the most dangerous part of underage alcohol consumption and create a safer social environment for all.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Column Unfair To Muslims

Mr. Iyengar's February 10 opinion piece reflects an insular observation of the world and expresses a jaundiced, perhaps even bigoted view of a major religion. He uses violent political actions of a few Muslims to judge Islam and its 1.3 billion adherents. Is it fair to say that a Sunni Kurd in Iran automatically has the same sentiments as a Druze Shi'a from Syria, much less that all Muslim believers in Africa and Asia are essentially alike? I don't think so. This is even worse than saying that an Irish Protestant and a Greek Orthodox Christian hold the same worldview because both are European. And even the title is an absurd personification of Islam.

Mr. Iyengar should know that Islam is as religiously, politically, and culturally diverse as any world religion. Islam has entered the consciousness of most Americans predominantly, though not exclusively, in the context of oil and terrorism. With this in mind, Americans and Europeans must be cognizant of the global context that affects the lives of Muslims everywhere. To characterize the reactions of some Muslims to the cartoons as "primal rage" is to promote an even more offensive version of Bernard Lewis's tired and suspect thesis about "The Roots of Muslim Rage." Just imagine trying to portray adherents of other religions in such terms.

The reality of the situation is that media and policy emanating from Western governments of Western nations has created a confrontational environment that has pitted "us" against "Islam". Mr. Iyengar has fallen into this trap. When he says that "there is nothing to talk about" with Muslims he betrays his own lack of confidence in the validity of his arguments. By providing a picture of a Muslim by using words like "primal," he is only reflecting the powerful interests served by the media and the far right.

Balancing Humor with Sensitivity

To the Editor:

In the February 10, 2006 edition of the Voice on page 3, a regular contributor to the Voice wrote an article about Valentine's Day. We recognize that free speech is of paramount importance, but encourage all writers to balance this freedom with sensitivity to issues that are painful to people on this campus and beyond. Specifically, the author includes a reference to "Roofie Surprise" in which someone apparently laces valentine heart candies with a drug commonly known to be a date-rape drug in order to go to bed with someone. Doing so is a not only a felony under Connecticut State law and a violation of College policy but most importantly, has happened to a number of people on this campus, their friends, and their family members. Although intended to be harmless and humorous, this type of humor can be both extremely hurtful and threatening. There is nothing funny about rape. We need to foster a campus environment that neither condones rape nor normalizes it with attempts at humor. We respectfully ask that authors keep in mind that the audience they wish to read their columns are the same ones that are greatly and adversely affected by insensitive references.

Respectfully,

SAC Appreciates Support

Dear Editors,

I want to extend a personal "thank you" for using editorial space last week to encourage participation in SAC. Comprised of representatives from many constituencies, SAC works extremely hard to ensure that the student body, staff, faculty, and the New London community will have venues in which to interact and, indeed, have fun in unique ways. Since the expectations of SAC are so high, it certainly is noticeable when positions are left vacant. At the same time, I need to point out that only three positions are not filled at this time out of more than forty, and as a whole, there seems to me to be very deep interest in ensuring the success of SAC. Every member on SAC, of both the executive board and the council, does a fantastic job. We have certainly had no shortage of creativity, energy, and commitment within SAC, which has directly resulted in a very successful year so far. I am quite pleased with the progress we have made as a team, I encourage members of the Junior and Senior class to run for the vacant positions, and I look forward to great times with the whole community for the rest of the year.

See you out there!

Important Difference Between "Pro-Abortion" and Pro-Choice"

As a Gender and Women's Studies minor, feminist activist, and a woman, I was discouraged and insulted by the Voice's article, "One State Stands Up to Judicial Tyranny." In its discussion of South Dakota's recently passed bill that would "ban nearly all abortions," the article failed to consider the humanistic side of the Pro-Choice Movement. The reporter made several judgments about the Pro-Choice side that were illogical and rendered his argument ineffective.

I would first like to point out that there are very few "pro-abortion activists" in this country. Like many others, I am pro-CHOICE, not pro-ABORTION. An abortion is a serious procedure that poses physical and emotional risks to the pregnant woman. The decision of whether or not to have an abortion is never easy and should not be approached lightly, but that does not mean that women should have the choice made for them by the government, or even the "majority vote." I support choice because I have faith in and respect for my fellow females and trust that we know ourselves and our bodies the best.

It is the Pro-Choice Movement's faith in the American public that the reporter does not recognize. He argues, "America is supposed to be a country in which the people decide how to govern themselves, but the pro-abortion crowd wants no part of that." The essence of the pro-choice debate is that women should govern themselves. The movement puts no pressure on women to have an abortion; rather, we are just interested in preserving the right for that woman to decide what is best for her body, her health, and her future.

With national levels of unemployment rising, it is more important than ever to ensure that every child in America be raised under adequate conditions and by consenting parents. The Pro-Choice Movement is pro-life, as it continues to work towards improving the lives of women, children, and families everywhere.

NIKHIL AMARENDRA IYENGAR • OUT IN RIGHT FIELD

The “slippery slope” argument against gay marriage has often been derided as a hysterical shriek by paranoid homophobes. However, recent events around the world are proving that traditional marriage is increasingly close to being redefined out of existence. In Sweden, the radical ic a l Feminist Initiative party (FI) has called for the elimination of traditional marriage and the introduction of a partnership system that is not only gender-neutral, but also accommodates for multiple partners (i.e., more than two). Similar demands are being made by the cultural elites in Canada. Each of these countries has already legalized gay unions, whether in the form of marriage (Canada), or “registered partnerships” (Sweden). As was predicted by many opponents of gay marriage, these countries are now dealing with whether or not to legalize polygamous marriages. The slope is getting more slippery.

Activists who want to replace traditional marriage often argue that marriage is a patriarchal, heterosexual norm that should be done away with so that the oppression of women and non-heterosexuals can be reduced. They also like to paint a picture of opponents of gay marriage as unthinking cavemen who simply hate gay people. (The accusation of bigotry is a trusty weapon for liberals engaging in arguments with conservatives).

While there are some people that truly do hate gay people, they are a small minority in this country. Most people who oppose gay marriage do so because it violates the traditional definition of the family, society, and civilization, by removing marriage from the responsibility of parenting, and because it will lead to the eventual eradication of traditional marriage.

I MAY BE RED, BUT I'M NO COMMIE

ANDREW MEYER • I HAVE ADD

This spring, an event takes place that will make us all question whether we are humans or savage beasts. Everyone will instantly change from polite and friendly to cutthroat and ruthless, as they drop the act of pretending to work together and blatantly stop caring about anyone but themselves. If you think I'm talking about a prison break, think again: welcome to the annual housing lottery!

Before I make jokes about it, let's be fair: it improved freshman and sophomore years, and it seems like this year it'll improve once again. That being said, there is nothing funnier than watching some of the nicest people you know openly start rooting for other people to get bad dorms so that they can get the one they wanted. It makes me wonder if we should all be Communists and just work together. Then I remember that the reason I'm so old is because I stayed back in preschool, so I'd probably suck at the whole “sharing” thing.

Unlike everyone else, I care about where you live and hope you get the best place possible, even if it means I won't get to live where I want. That's why I'm recommending that you live off campus next year. Think about it: you can eat whatever you want every night, you don't have to pay the school's room and board fee, and you won't have Campus Safety knocking on your door during your Beirut game (which is always dangerous, since heart attacks are even worse when you're already drunk.) This is why I suggest that you live off campus, and not apply for any dorms next year, especially if you happen to be a male junior who is considering living in any dorms that start with “H” and end with “arkness.” Another reason not to go there is that the Marriage and parenting have gone together since time immemorial. If traditional marriage was not the best way to raise children, would evolution and progress through the millennia not have replaced it with a different system? If we allow gay and polygamous marriage to become legal, we will also be allowing many children to be raised in an entirely unnatural and foreign environment.

Finally, by allowing more and more types of unions to count as “marriage,” traditional marriage will effectively be redefined out of existence. In other words, if everything is “marriage,” then nothing really is. Radical feminists and others advocating for gay marriage know that most Americans will not sign on to a movement with the explicit goal of abolishing marriage. Thus, their plan is to legalize gay marriage and, as we are seeing abroad, even polygamy, so that traditional marriage loses its meaning.

Opposing gay marriage is not about hating gay people. I believe that gays should have the same rights as all other Americans, but when it comes to marriage, in light of events abroad, I am more convinced than ever that legalizing gay marriage will put us on a slippery slope toward the eventual extinction of traditional marriage.

On another topic, I want to address some issues that students raised with regard to a column I wrote two weeks ago. Generally I am loathe to apologize for or clarify my comments, for fear of appearing to cave in to what I refer to as the “thought police” on campus, but I do not want to let distortions of my column go unanswered. I was accused of “generalizing” about Islam in my column, although I referred to the current upswing in Islamic violence as a “current trend,” and specifically referred to “militant Islam” as the ideology that must be defeated. However, the title of my column, “Islam Shows Its True Nature,” was an overgeneralization and a mistake on my part.

Housefellow is from an island, and you can never trust those islanders. I make these suggestions for your own benefit, of course. Not because I'm trying to save space there for me. I would never do that.

Now that we've gotten that out of the way, a few random thoughts for the rest of the column...

I think it's time to put this space to public use (an undebatable one... not a Kelo v. New London “is it public? I don't know. Do you know? Neither does he” use), and address an issue that has been bothering me for 2+ years: the bulletin broadcast review. If someone important is reading this, hear me out: the bulletin broadcast review system doesn't work. The most important messages are saved for it, and it's the only type of message that does not make my message light flash. I am not looking forward to the day where my message light starts blinking because of an all-group a cappella concert, but when I go to check messages, I have a “Bulletin Broadcast Review. This is an important message from the office of impending doom and disasters. The nearby nuclear plant has blown up, and you should all take your iodine pills, unless you're a gambler, in which case you can try to mutate into a ninja turtle, but you risk turning into that stupid rhino instead” message from four days earlier.

The problem with living in dorms where you have no control over the heat: the temperature in my room says, “Open the damn window.” The skunk outside says, “Close the damn window.” The voice in my head says “break the damn window.”

On a serious note, Howard Stern's show is disappointing. Wait... never mind, that's a Sirius note. Anyway, I'm finally on Facebook. If you have suggestions for a column, feel free to throw some graffiti on my wall.

Final thought: do people who hate the Bengals call T.J. Houshmandzadeh “T.J. Douchemandzadeh?”

“MILITANT DEMOCRACY” FLEXES ITS MUSCLES

YONI FREEMAN • OCCUPIED TERRITORY

Following the end of World War II, the murderous Nazi regime was disbanded and removed from the face of the earth. In the aftermath of the rebuilding of Western Europe, newly constituted states developed democratic institutions. However, there were new institutions, particularly found in Germany and Austria, created to safeguard democracy from itself — because, after all, it was not a coup or rebellion that brought Hitler to power, but the ballot box. Essentially, the thinking was that some limits on democracy were necessary in order to preserve the future of democracy.

Germany and Austria have very strong laws that deal with preventing a Nazi-like government being reconstituted again, and laws that deal with preserving the history of this Nazi period exist too. It is against the law to publicly deny the history of the Holocaust. David Irving, the world-famous Holocaust-denying “historian,” was finally punished on Monday for this

THE WORTH OF THE EARTH

ALLIE BALDWIN • ENVIRONMENTAL COLUMNIST

When I got back from Italy, all I could think about was Dante, Leopardi, gelato and pizzoccheri (it's this amazing grainy pasta from the Valtellina region in the pre-Alps in the northeast). I was convinced I had abandoned my love for the Earth and concerned that I'd be living in Earth House as a traitor. But could I combine my love for the Earth with a love for really delicious food

(and other important aspects of Italian culture).

Today the natural world is becoming increasingly recognized for its importance in contributing to a better life, both for the resources on which we depend and for the peace of mind we find in its simple beauty. In the classical world, the Earth was not viewed as a disappearing commodity, yet Cicero, upon whom the Renaissance depends, somehow envisioned the natural world as a measure of beauty.

For Cicero (106-43 B.C.) beauty is derived from three categories:

VICTORY IN IRAQ

NICHOLAS CULVER • PROGRESSIVE THINKING

Will we win? Can we win? Have we won already? Lost?

These are all fairly useless questions without a clear definition of victory. The problem is that the term victory has itself become political. If President George Bush can legitimately claim victory in Iraq, then the President and other war supporters get a boost politically. If the term victory cannot be given to the war in Iraq, then war critics will be able to add the ultimate failure in Iraq to credible charges of pre-war White House deceptions.

The costs of the continuing armed presence in Iraq are substantial. In addition to losses of blood, treasure, and international prestige, the occupation will continue to assist Al-Qaeda recruiters worldwide. It becomes understandably easier to promote the destruction of the United States when American troops are actually occupying a Muslim country, regardless of the circumstances. With these costs in mind, if it is determined that victory has been achieved to the fullest extent possible, then the withdrawal of American troops should follow as swiftly as possible. Sadly, this withdrawal will again give Bin Laden and followers a boost as they will be Austrian crime, getting three years in prison. He had denied the Holocaust on Austrian territory during the late 1980s at a number of speaking events.

In front of 300 listeners, Irving on one occasion claimed that the “Night of the Broken Glass” in 1938 was committed by people impersonating SA thugs, that Auschwitz had no gas chambers, that Anne Frank never wrote a diary as the pen she described had not yet been invented, and that Hitler never ordered the murder of Jews. Those Jews who died in camps died of disease, not by murder.

The trial, which took one day, had Irving, at its start, declare that he was guilty: “I was wrong when I said there were no gas chambers in Auschwitz. The Nazis did murder millions of Jews,” he affirmed, while parading his most famous book “Hitler's War” — that contradicted his words. He also turned to the press saying “new documents” had come to his attention which made him change his mind (they must have been those prosecution papers).

The conviction of David Irving has three implications. For one, the militant democratic institutions of Austria have proven their value by the judge's decision to put this liar in jail. It is one thing to have a private opinion on the matter, but it is another thing when you have someone with the title of “historian” going around your country, lecturing to the youth, and denying the greatest crime in human history, which your country committed.

The second clear result of this decision has been a blow to this person's broadcasting of Holocaust-denying propaganda. Irving can take his lies to his jail cell, and maybe start denying he was in jail, and really on a cruise liner.

Finally, this decision has sowed disunity in the neo-Nazi camp of the world because of the many who had supported Irving's “findings.” Some in the movement have been turned away by Irving's ease of remorse and “selling out,” that he did so just to get a shorter jail sentence. Their sickening worldview now has two camps — one still supporting Irving, the other with contempt for his gutless giving in to the court.

The verdict of this Austrian court should be extended to Abu Mazen, the Palestinian Authority leader, who wrote his doctorate claiming the Holocaust was “only” the death of around 700,000 Jews, and that it was due to collaboration between

The beauty in this order can be expressed further through the functionality of nature as well as its organic qualities found therein.

Cicero also took on the functional aspect of beauty. In order to justify the beauty of flowers, which serve no purpose, Cicero asserts that their beauty lies in the simple fact that they are a part of the order of nature. The organic identity of a component of nature brings Cicero pleasure above all things while the aesthetic value provides an “experience for him.” The experience can occur through sight, smell or taste, each of which contributes an essential component to the beautiful whole, and if one of these qualities is lacking, beauty cannot be attained.

I do not adhere to the classical virtue that civilization, or the conquest of nature, is greater than the untamed environment in that it “unites” humans with their surroundings. For Cicero, adding a civilization to nature could also be viewed as an enhancement of an already-beautiful system. He's wrong. However, it is heartwarming to know that at one time a statesman could appreciate the natural world. Uniqueness, the very essence of the Zionists and the Nazis. The Iranian Holocaust-denying government should also be censured by Europe. Closing down their embassies and expelling their anti-Semitic ambassadors are some things that should have been done months ago. Just recently, Iran's ambassador to Portugal went on Portuguese radio claiming that it was impossible for six million Jews to have died, because it would have taken fifteen years for their bodies to be burned.

Like the Nazis, Holocaust deniers base their activities on the premise they are able to escape without paying a price. The Nazis were certain of their victory, which is why they committed their atrocities without mercy. If they knew what would have happened in the end, they would have probably acted a little differently, fearing punishment. This brings us back to Irving, and his ilk. He held his opinions even though he was proven to be a liar and a fake, but he thought no one would touch him (even entering Austria knowing there was a warrant out for his arrest). In the end, justice tracked him down. There can definitely be no revisionism of these facts.

diversity, is imperative to a beautiful system as it unifies. Each planet is distinct and offers an original sphere to the heavens, just as every object in an ecosystem is unique and significant in maintaining the fragile balance.

Today stepping outside of the chaotic world and experiencing the simple beauty of nature often refreshes me. Nature's worth is frequently overlooked but nonetheless imperative to our perception of beauty.

A classical figure, Cicero, was truly an inspiration for the Renaissance and my subsequent obsession with all things Italian. And even though he was part of the political scene of ancient Rome, he still managed to love the Earth. And Rome is the longest-lived democracy in the history of Western civilization. Ours, on the other hand... well, I'm just glad there's a resistance that can sustain me until I return to the land of sculpture, opera, and, of course, vino.

Still, most factors indicate that the Iraqi regime will hold together. The democratic process has progressed effectively and the crucial minority Sunni parties have stayed active in the Iraqi Parliament. Iraqis have fought an exhaustive ten-year war with Iran and suffered together through U.N. sanctions; both were presumably nationalism-building experiences. Civil war would require a total breakdown in the Iraqi army since an American withdrawal will certainly weaken the insurgency significantly and delegitimize foreign terrorists. This brings up the third remaining objective in Iraq.

Destroy the insurgency, control the borders, and stabilize the security situation:

The pre-war troop estimates of General Tommy Franks, General Shinseki, and others were disregarded, and today the Iraqi security situation cannot be remedied by force. Instead, the best way of defeating the insurgency today would be to simply enact a phased withdrawal of American troops. Without the specter of a potentially permanent occupation of foreign troops, the general populace would lose all tolerance for attacks on Iraqi targets, depriving the insurgency of its critical popular acceptance. In addition, many insurgent groups only fight on

ARTS&ENTERTAINMENT

Photography and the Page: Photos for Me and You

BY ARETI SAKELLARIS

staff writer

There's something about looking at photos that has a soothing effect. Maybe they remind you of your childhood and sitting with your parents thumbing through snapshots of summer vacations and horribly offensive outfits of Disney character-clothing and Crayola-colored pants. While "Photography and the Page" cannot bring your Mickey sweater and fuchsia corduroys back in style, it can provide relief on a late afternoon to fill the lull between classes and the evening hours.

"Photography and the Page" presents the work of four photographers whose respective work has been published. Choosing and setting up a shot is a creative process for every artist, and choosing from those prints for a book is possibly an even more challenging process. Ted Hendrickson, Miles Ladin, Laura Wilson, and Philip Trager have each combined their personal endeavors in art with those in public life for their books and the exhibit.

Connecticut College Professor of Art Ted Hendrickson's work from Time Tide and Place, A Saltwater Fly Fisher's Journal is the marriage of photos and field reports of the conditions of, tactics used, and observations made from his personal fishing expeditions. For him, the "flies themselves are an attraction," and he hopes that his work can inspire others to try fly fishing—or at least better understand it. Each of his photos is a self-portrait, and in many his image is blurred, perhaps because his very presence is on the edge of the boundary between the human landscape with the natural habitat of fish. When mixed with the humorous commentary, like: "Wow, this is it, that 25 pounder that's been waiting... the one I saw in a dream..." the solemnity of the accompanying photo becomes human and establishes one universal, all-encompassing environment (Plate 3 Spread).

Alumnus and New York photographer Miles Ladin has created Lunch Poems in homage to Frank O'Hara's work of the same title. The color limited edition unbound portfolio asks to be handled and "skirt[s] the line between photographs and drawing." The overlay, contradictions, interactions, and humor of his cutting-edge shots are remarkable. Everything not only looks real on paper, it jumps out and shakes you. Ladin said, "I stole these images and ruminations strolling through the noisy splintered glare of a Manhattan noon." Imagine the vivacity of NYC captured.

Laura Wilson, alumna and part time instructor, is known for her portraiture and fondness for the West. While she has done work for international newspapers and magazines, her contributions to the exhibit come from her book Hutterites of Montana. The Hutterites are an intensely reclusive Christian denomination, and even portraits of them are deemed anathema. Regardless of this hesitation to be photographed, Wilson's photos strike a chord and harken back to a more traditional way of life, and shots like Emma Kleinsasser (1994) offer glimpses of a forgotten life. On the other hand, her presentation is thoroughly modern: Ron Hufer, Twelve, Balancing on his Father's Appaloosa (1994) is vivid to the point of seeming unreal.

Cummings is also privileged with a selection of world-renowned Philip Trager's work, whose ten books have received critical acclaim, three of which have been honored as Editors' Choice by the New York Times Book Review. He presents bodies, usually in motion, with an appreciation to classical ideals. Daniel Ezralow is of a man floating beside a tree, as if he should be on a pendulum: the shot challenges viewers to figure out how it was taken and to ponder the physicality demanded of both Trager and Ezralow. The Los Angeles Times proclaims his work "besiege[s] the eye with a bold sense of mystery, contradiction, and surprise."

While there is not a clear unifying concept between the four photographers, it does not detract from the exhibit; instead, it makes the work of each one stand out. The wide range of artistic styles, presentation, and subject matter underscore the personal choices required of photographers. The exhibit promises variety and substantive works to engage the tastes and intellects of a range of viewers.

Mary, Mary: Not Quite So Contrary

BY ANDREA RODESCHINI

staff writer

Mary, Mary is James Patterson's newest addition to the Alex Cross series of murder mysteries (his previous ones include Kiss the Girls and Along Came a Spider). His most sophisticated thriller yet finds FBI detective Alex Cross taking a much needed vacation with his family to Disneyland out in California. As luck would have it, the famous Hollywood actress, Antonia Schiffman, is shot outside her home in Beverly Hills. Most disturbing is the slashing of the victim's face beyond recognition, which becomes the killer's trademark. Shortly afterward, an editor from the Los Angeles Times, Arnold Griner, receives a grisly e-mail detailing the murder from the killer, Mary Smith. She indicates this is not to be taken as an isolated incident and forewarns of her intent to kill again. Found at the crime scenes, alongside the mauling of the victims' faces (all Hollywood A-listers), are kid-themed stickers with the letters A, A, B written on them.

Fear spreads throughout the Los Angeles area as the case escalates by blockbuster proportions as the media gets wind of the e-mails and increasingly frequent murders of celebrities. The LAPD and FBI frantically attempt to keep the details under wraps as they scramble to find a pattern before Mary can send one more chilling update. The main question that perplexes Alex is how could a woman be capable of committing murders to this degree? Is there an accomplice or just a pawn in her plot?

However, this murder mystery/police procedural drama is interspersed with scenes from the crisis in Alex's personal life. His ex-wife, Christine, visits and is horrified to learn of Alex's involvement in the case and sees it as a potential danger to their son, Alex, Jr. This leads to an "intermission" halfway through the book to the legal court over Alex's custody battle (which Cross loses). Then his life is further complicated by his attraction to his old friend Dr. Kayla Coles who is treating his mother, Nana, when Alex briefly returns to D.C. While the world searches for Mary Smith as further murders occur, Alex tries to balance his family obligations with his continuing role as the FBI liaison in the case—which means living a bicoastal existence. The nature of the crimes and the repeated references to the children of the victims by Mary Smith in her emails constantly remind Alex of the primacy of his family in his life and how his profession adds to the fragility of their relationship.

Patterson manages to balance Cross's personal and work life in a way that it does not detract from the suspenseful momentum he develops. He constructs a riveting story with enough misdirection to keep the reader guessing, and enough tension to make this a real page-turner. It features the typical Patterson formula of short chapters, which make it a much faster read than the 397 pages would suggest. The only complaint I have about this novel is that a few of the developments, which occurred late in the story and were crucial to the conclusion, seemed totally unrealistic and inconsistent both with normal police procedure and also the storyline up to that point. Patterson attempted to create maximum dramatic impact and shock value at the expense of internal consistency, despite that fact that the story was tense enough and the plot so well constructed that such embellishments were unnecessary. However, I highly suggest this latest addition to the Alex Cross series. Because I know that no one has time to sit down and read (let alone breathe), the Shain Library has it available on a CD which features the voices of three readers adding to the dramatic impact of the murder mystery itself—making it feel more like attending a play than a straight forward "read."

Noah's Floods The Mouth With Flavor

BY CHARLOTTE BOTHE

staff writer

Because I will always be eager and willing to experience any and all new tastes and flavors, when my parents came down this past weekend I quickly seized on the opportunity to spend, no joke, a couple of hours on my computer looking for area restaurants that peaked my curiosity. As it happened, I ended up returning to the website of a place in Stonington Borough that my family and I had dined at about this same time last year. In fact, we had been there twice on this previous visit of theirs, once for dinner and once the following morning for brunch. The website assured me that there would be a completely new set of dishes to try and, of course, critique!

Despite making a late appearance for our reservation (typical of my family) and being seated instead in the informal bar area, the evening was not sacrificed. In fact, with the Olympics on the TV in the corner of the room and several groups of avid watchers, the atmosphere ended up being more friendly and relaxed. However, we surely missed the formal dining room with its paintings by local artists.

Now, down to the food! I eagerly opened my menu to discover that Noah's remained true to its word and that besides the "All Seasons Menu," none of the dishes were remotely similar to our choices last year. As I went down the list, I first came across their selection of s e a f o o d dishes, such as pan-seared scallops, baked cod, grilled salmon, and, to my great surprise, a seafood stew similar to the French "Bouillabaisse" that I have never been able to resist. For land dishes, Noah's offered sautéed veal, crusted pork chops, and a chicken "paprakas" dish, all sounding equally tempting. The "All Seasons Menu" also had an abundance of dishes to choose from, including the ever-popular filet mignon, a fettuccine with basil pesto, and a dish of breadcrumb crusted flounder.

Though the decision was tough to make, there was no way I was going to pass up an opportunity to try such an abundance of seafood in one dish, so I went with the stew. Needless to say, I ended up being very pleased with my decision. The array of seafood was a mouth-watering combination of shellfish that included clams, mussels, a lobster tail, giant shrimp, and scallops, which were all plunged into a steaming hot bath of a tomato-based broth seasoned with a most complementary hint of saffron. The stew itself also included white rice and potatoes, which were delightfully not too soggy. Both these starches, along with the homemade whole-grain bread, served as the perfect sponges to mop up all the succulent juices of the stew.

Not surprisingly my mom ordered the same dish, as I think I have adopted her taste for seafood. My dad had the chicken "paprakas," of which I naturally had to have a bite. The dish was beautifully presented with the chicken placed over a bed of spaetzle surrounded by sugar-snap peas and generously drenched with a paprika-seasoned cream-based sauce. Having been to Eastern Europe, I was mostly astonished by how closely the flavors of the dish matched those of its origins. The spaetzle was wonderfully buttery and, taken together with the chicken and sauce, created a very complementary combination of flavors.

Although the array of homemade desserts was certainly tempting, I was so satisfied from my meal that we ended up just having a round of coffee and tea to finish off our meal. All in all the experience was as good as the first time, and perhaps I will make it back next year!

Noah's is located in Stonington Borough, and for information on directions, menu options and contacts there is a website, www.noahsfinefood.com.

PESPECTIVES IN MUSIC

THAT'S SENOR FLYING KITTEN TO YOU

My first exposure to the band Electric Six was watching a flash video on the Internet that showed flying kittens with Viking helmets dancing to the song "Gay Bar," off of the band's 2003 album Fire. The site was undoubtedly created by someone with too much time on his or her hands, but I don't think the band would have necessarily disapproved.

By BEN FISHER

the alternative perspective

Electric Six follows in the wake of the Darkness (or rather proceeds them, if you count the band's previous incarnation – the Wildbunch – which emerged in the 90s) with a style of rock and roll that is fashionably out of date, invoking an era when bands had longer hair, tighter pants, and double basses. But while the Darkness (allegedly) take themselves very seriously, Electric Six certainly does not. The lyrics from their latest release Senor Smoke say it all—"evil boys eating evil hamburgers," "like electric underwear, the idea never had a chance to go anywhere." I lost it when I heard a completely deadpan monotone "Backstreet's back alright" on the fourth track.

This playfulness makes Senor Smoke an enjoyable album to listen to, but one that will get old quickly for the musical snob searching for deep, soul wrenching moments under the sly one-liners and catchy guitar riffs. But hedonistic entertainment is not the only thing here. Under the wailing and power ballads there is a sense of regret for that lost era when bands were not judged for being over the top. The songs are about fear, uncertainty, and being misunderstood as much as they are about sex, drugs, and rock and roll.

Electric Six has hit many obstacles recording this album: a change in line-up, signing to a U.K. record label when nobody in America would accept them. Though Fire's "Danger! High Voltage" was a successful single, the band has had difficulty proving there can be substance in the absurd. The public's flirtation with bands of their ilk seems to have tarnished. The Darkness's second album didn't get much press in the States, and Electric Six remixes with Jack White have likewise failed to get anyone hyped for this album. It seems inevitable that Electric Six will gather dust alongside Ace of Base and Chumbawumba, to be brushed off and played only to gawk at.

In order for this album to work, you need to be game enough to go along for the ride. Electric Six is not to be laughed at, but to be laughed with as it satirizes the pretentiousness of modern rock music. Does this cost the band some points in the artistic merit department? You betcha. Senor Smoke will never be on a critic's top ten list, but (like the flying kitten website) you have to wonder if the band gives a hoot. If you're too cool to rock it the way Electric Six says so, most likely the band doesn't want you to rock it at all. If you're willing to play along, however, the sky's the limit. Don't let the smoke get in your eyes.

Kathleen Cleaver Dispels Myths About Rosa Parks, Civil Rights Movement

By LIZ MURRAY

Professor Kathleen Cleaver, a distinguished educator, lawyer, activist and professor at Emory University gave a stirring lecture on Tuesday in Blaustein. Professor Cleaver has been debunking the myths surrounding Rosa Parks for years.

"I always heard the story about how Rosa Parks got on the bus and was really tired so she sat in the front of the segregated bus," Peter Weymouth '09 said when asked about the story regarding Rosa Parks in school. "Martin Luther King tried to help after her arrest, and it basically jump-started the Civil Rights Movement," Weymouth added.

These stories are exactly what Professor Cleaver attempted to discredit in her lecture. She explained that not just the acts of one person, but community solidarity, organization, and leadership help to initiate movements such as the Civil Rights Movement.

Parks was a symbol for the movement, Cleaver stated. However, her image of being respectful and nonviolent gave the false illusion that simple acts start a revolution, Cleaver added.

She noted that Parks was never "tired" when she got on that bus. The NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) was looking for a plaintiff to use in court to show that the segregation was unjust. Parks just happened to be in the right place at the right time, according to Cleaver.

Moreover, only a few weeks earlier, a teenager by the name of Professor Kathleen Cleaver, a professor at Emory University in Atlanta, dispelled commonly-held myths about civil rights hero Rosa Parks (Web).

Claudette Colvin was arrested for exactly the same actions that Parks was arrested for (refusing to give up her seat to a white person), but she did not acquire the fame that Parks did because she happened to be unwed and pregnant. Cleaver explained that Rosa Parks was not the first black person who refused to give up their seat to a white person, she was simply the woman the NAACP used as their plaintiff to gain the notoriety they needed to jump start their cause.

After Professor Cleaver righted the myth behind Rosa Parks, she continued by asking how far the Civil Rights Movement has influenced our nation. She asked everyone in the lecture hall to raise their hand if they went to a high school that was evenly distributed by race. Out of the approximate 40 people in attendance, only ten raised their hands to show that their school was racially equal.

In response to this display, Cleaver questioned whether the separate but equal policy instituted by Plessy v. Ferguson has really been abolished if schools are still not equal.

"Why shouldn't justice and emancipation be the norm," Cleaver asked. "Will our society ever be truly equal?"

Voice Auto Review: Toyota Tacoma

By OWEN COONEY

staff writer

In High School, there's always that buddy who everyone agrees has the nicest car, and who is forced into unofficial chauffeur duties so his friends don't have to be seen in their own crappy cars. For me, this was my buddy "Goat's" '99 Toyota 4Runner. The first time we rode in it, Goat backed it into a telephone pole, which didn't go over well because he had taken it without asking. When my Jetta finally crapped out, the 4Runner was my primary method of transportation to school, movies, parties, home, and everywhere in between. It was a soccer-mom mobile and we knew it, but it was the best we had, and so we drove it hard and often. Thinking about that car takes me back to nervously sitting next to pretty girls in the car wash, or keeping the car running while one of us with a fake I.D. made a run for some cheap beer. Goat kept it clean as a whistle, he was infinitely proud of his car, but was still a good enough friend not to give me hell when I threw up in it after a party. Tearing down Rt. 9G Sunday morning, I woke up from a hung over nap in the back seat, and launched too much beer and too little food against the slowly descending window, and then down the side of the 4Runner's doors. I was shocked, honestly shocked, to run into Goat the other day at a bar, and have him ask if I wanted to see his new truck. My appalled look was dissolved, though, when he informed me of the type of car. The 4Runner had been traded in for a 2005 Toyota Tacoma, with an extended cab and a TRD off-road package. This is not the SUV handed down from your mom. This is a man's truck. Nicknamed, "Yoda," (as in Toyoda) the Tacoma is neither small nor green. This truck is big, black, and badass. Remember when six-cylinder trucks were the undersized, underpowered excuses for a work horse? Those days are gone, as this Tacoma puts 263 horses through seamless on-the-fly 4wd, and into 17-inch, off-road rated rubbers. The 4Runners sleek leather has been replaced by slick mesh covered seats, and the immaculate SUV's white paint has been replaced by black, with a fair share of mud. As Goat puts it, "It looks good in black, but better in dirt."

A great deal of that dirt came from this past week, when we took the truck out to earn its "Tacoma Diploma," on an off-roading course close to campus. Having only done this in a Jeep, I was slightly concerned about the Tacoma's abilities.

However, my fears were unfounded. She rocks, she rolls, and she rips through mud and sand like a truck shouldn't be able to, thanks to a locking rear differential and fantastic 4wd. In addition to the cramped back seat (it's an extended cab, for short trips and luggage only), I got a good look at the six-foot bed, which was a bit slippery for my liking, though this impression may be a result of my bouncing and sliding around in it with a video camera. Despite this, I got some great shots of the Tacoma trundling down hill over rocks, and tearing through ice covered mud pits. For those that haven't tried this, it's the it's about the best way to have fun in a pick-up truck without, to quote Goat, "A tow cable, winch, and six or seven strippers. Actually, better make that a baker's dozen."

The Tacoma is two types of fantastic, no way around it. For about 25 grand, it ain't cheap, but it's a Toyota, so it'll run until doomsday. We'll both miss the 4Runner, but I think giving up on the icons of your youth is a step to growing up and getting old. The 4Runner has been driven, lived in, loved in, laughed in, puked in, smoked in, fought in, crashed in, trashed in, sped in, spun in (twice), had its fair share of fun in, and sappily enough, grown up in. That being said, it's time to grow up more, and like any other big step, you've got to be wearing the right outfit. In this case, black metal, big rubber, and a lot of mud.

Yoni's Horoscopes!

Pure, unfiltered Yoni-isms, just the way you like them.

Aries – Trust in the number 15. Don't open any doors to the Camel Van, even if there is an attractive woman trying to get in. Don't go to the Fast Food lane in Harris either, those will not be hamburgers.

Taurus – You will get a good mark on a graded paper or test this week. However, two days later you will figure out you really go your neighbor's paper instead.

Gemini – You will mysteriously find an extra sock in your laundry basket. Trust in the number 132.

Cancer – The stars will be shining on your personality traits this week. You will meet a new friendly person. However, he will soon want to borrow your car...don't let him have it.

Leo – Trust in the number 37. Don't answer any phone calls with the area code 902.

Virgo – You will get a package in the mail, however the mail room will never deliver that red slip. Make sure you get on their case!

Libra – Remember to get up really early this week, because there will be someone outside your window waiting...or watching.

Scorpio – You will be called on more than usual in class. Make sure you read before hand, and take notes. Oh, and finally buy your books for the class.

Sagittarius – I only have one advice to you – remember to take your key the next time the fire drill rings, and lock the door.

Captain Crunch – You will find that a person you have been seeing for the past 3 months is really your secret admirer. Tread the water wisely.

Aquarium – Don't wear red or yellow clothes this week. Don't watch channel 22 either, you will not like what you will see.

Pisces – Don't trust in any numbers. Double check whether you are actually going into your room. Look both ways before crossing the street.

Victory in Iraq

against perceived occupiers and Iraqi collaborationists; some groups would pursue a stake in the Iraqi regime as Americans withdraw. Of course, without effective government and economic infrastructure, a trained security force, and a viable nationalist identity, an American withdrawal could merely led to insurgent wars of territory, and ultimately, a failed state. Therefore, it is the balancing of these priorities with an acceptance of the circumstances out of our control which should drive our policy and determine our withdrawal date, instead of either the empty promise of a fight until victory or premature declarations of defeat.

The small risk of state failure and a perceived victory for the terrorists combine to make an American withdrawal unattractive, but not when compared to an indefinite military presence, even if the casualty count can be continually shifted to Iraqis. Continuing to pursue our own total victory in Iraq will soon become detrimental to the United States as the costs mount and the benefits become marginal.

MASTERING THE ART OF TEACHING

Sheila Wycinowski, Director of Curriculum and Staff Development at Amity High School, explains, "Basically we look to hire Quinnipiac students. They have a clear understanding of lesson planning and classroom management and the balance between them." She also characterizes Quinnipiac students as articulate, creative, able to encourage higher-level thinking in students, and able to incorporate technology into their teaching.

17:45.60. Wilson is one of the two provisionally qualified swimmers for the 2006 NCAA Championship. The time topped her NCAA qualifying performance of 17:46.62 at the 2004 NESCAC Championship. Wilson finished fourth for CC in the 1,000 yard freestyle, narrowly missing a school record with a time of 10:39.47.

Mallory Watson '08 also provisionally qualified herself for the NCAA Championships and earned a spot on the NESCAC All-Conference squad with a third place finish in the 50 yard backstroke. Watson also set school records in the 100 and 200 yard backstroke, with respective times of (1:00.41, 6th) and (2:10.01, 8th).

Other Camels swimming in strong performances were Jess Miga '09, who earned All-NESCAC honors with a time of 26.77 and Katelyn Brochu '08 set a school record with a fourth place finishing time of 31.15 seconds in the 50 yard breaststroke.

Coach Benvenuti went on to comment, "in November we had individuals, but by February we had a team who would fight for each other and for their college. I think there was also a great feeling of trying to rise to the occasion to send the seniors off in a manner befitting their leadership."

Coach Benvenuti also picked up the award for NESCAC Coach of the Year and when asked to comment he diverted the attention from himself in the true manner that he is accustomed to and praised not only the senior class but also the hunger of his underclassmen. "my award is just a reflection of all the hard work and effort the team put in all year. We had great seniors who led by example and underclassmen who were very eager to prove something. When you get both of those things happening, you're going to see some incredible performances."

This coming weekend the Men's team will be in action for their NESCAC Championships, hosted by Williams College.

contract expires at the end of the season and they released Francis, who was due $15-, $16-, and $17 million dollars in each of the next three years and will now have a decent amount of money to build a team around Dwight Howard and a few other good role players. The deal appears to have worked out well for both sides, but Isaiah has a lot more work to do. The ultimate goal is making the Knicks a winning franchise again and to do that he has to do a few things. First, he needs to continue to unload the bad players he has signed to bad contracts. None of them are really helping the team and addition by subtraction was termed for this situation. In return for his overpaid players he should seek expiring contracts and/or draft picks that could help down the road. One of the biggest problems is that he has failed to assemble the roster that his coach, Brown, wants. If they could get draft picks or clear cap room to go after free agents, the two could begin to build a roster with which they both are happy. The biggest key to Isaiah's success is realizing no one should be untouchable on his team. There is nothing wrong with thinking highly of Frye, but he cannot afford to blindly disregard offers that could help the team because they involve a player that has potential, but is by no means a sure thing. If they could get Kevin Garnett, for example, a package involving Channing Frye would be a small price to pay for someone who instantly brings credibility to an organization. Right now, just that would be an upgrade for the Knicks.

Grumpy Old Men

such a back-and-forth argument could be better used to tackle problems of greater significance. In regards to the Winter Olympics having or not having the world's greatest athletes I say this: although I don't know a lot about the training that goes into many of the events at the Olympics, I think it's quite obvious that the average Joe can't just walk in and compete in speed skating or ice dancing. We know that many of the athletes in the Winter Olympics are not black, but should that lessen the abilities of the other athletes involved in this winter's competition? I don't think so.

Point number 2: "Like try not to be incredulous when someone attempts to link these games to those of the ancient Greeks who never heard of skating or skiing." Actually Mr. Gumbel, the way I see it, the Olympics, whether they be during Winter or Summer, are about the competition of the world's best athletes battling in various events. Yes, fewer people may watch the Winter Olympics because there is not as great a following for some of the sports, but that does not make the athletes or the whole event itself any less worthy of recognition than its sibling, the Summer Olympics. Though I have not gone out of my way to watch much of this winter's competition, I would stop to watch highlights if they were presented to me.

Point number 3: "Try not to point out that something's not really a sport if a pseudo-athlete waits in what's called a 'kiss and cry' area while some panel of subjective judges decides who won." Okay, so maybe there is some more artistic expression involved, but I still don't see how Mr. Gumbel could ignore such aspects as balance, coordination, agility, and endurance; all facets of any kind of athletic competition.

Point number 4: "And try to blot out all logic when announcers and sportswriters pretend to care about the luge, the skeleton, the biathlon and all those other events they don't understand and totally ignore for all but three weeks every four years." Is it their fault that the Winter Olympics only happen every four years, and that only then do the major networks choose to focus on those sports? Frankly, I would not be very surprised if in some parts of America, and around the world, such sports are talked about on a year-in, year-out basis. It's not the fault of those announcers and sportswriters that the average American doesn't appreciate the skeleton as much as he/she appreciates any one of the four major sports.

Point number 5: "Face it, these Olympics are little more than a marketing plan to fill space and sell time during the dreary days of February." That may be, but what should one do when football is on leave, and baseball is just awakening from hibernation? Cancel the Winter Olympics and rely solely on hockey and basketball to carry the torch? Hah! Now that, Mr. Gumbel, would be an example of the trying times that Thomas Paine so eloquently spoke of.

Camel Runners Finish Successful DIII Championship

By PETER STERLING

sports editor

The Connecticut College men's and women's track teams have had a productive winter season so far. Both sides competed in the Division III Championship, with MIT hosting the men's event, and Tufts University the girl's. Many Camel runners earned qualifying times during the weekend of February 11th at the Boston University and Wesleyan University Invitational, and the Camels looked strong last weekend, with numerous runners on hand to represent their college.

When all was said and done on Saturday, nine Conn teammates received All-New England Honors, split between the men and women's events. There were numerous bright spots in the women's championship as several racers excelled in individual and relay events.

Margaret Bacon '06 raced to a fourth-place finish in the 5K distance run, finishing with a time of 18:09.03 at Tufts. Also in the 5K, Lindsay Schakenbach and Melissa Lacey finished less than a minute behind Bacon, with times of 18:42.75 and 18:59.77, respectively. Their performances earned them qualifications to the Trinity Last Chance Invitational, held at Yale University. The race will be held Friday, March 3rd. Bacon's performance qualified her for the All-New England Championship, held on February 24th-25th at Boston University. Elizabeth Claise, Molly Sease, Jill Sergi and Susie Greenebaum notched an eighth-place finish in the distance medley relay, recording a time of 12:15.71.

Quad-captain Brian Adams '06 placed sixth in the 1,000 meter distance, finishing with a time of 2:33.56. Adams then joined fellow Camels Matt Bannish, Andrew McCullough and Brian Murtagh for the distance medley relay. The teammates finished with a time of 10:46.47, good enough for seventh place. A new school record was set in the pentathlon, with Henry Gaud '07 notching a score of 2,536 points.

The men's indoor team will lose six seniors to graduation this year, while the women will see nine depart at the season's end. Despite these losses, both squads display excellent depth and promise for next year. Many of these runners will also continue into the spring track & field season as well. For both men and women, the NCAA Championships will be held on March 10th-11th at St. Olaf, Minnesota.

Hockey Earns NESCAC Berth

By Steve Strauss

sports editor

Playing ice hockey in the tricky NESCAC can be quite the double-edged sword. It seems that the nationally ranked opponents never stop coming and the numbers in the loss column never stop growing. Success over these odds is all the more sweet. The Conn women's ice hockey team (6-12-4) found out just how sweet and how difficult to attain NESCAC success can be. In a case of crushing irony, their constant regular season goal of earning a NESCAC playoff spot was earned in an ugly loss. On Friday, February 17th, the lady Camels were shut out on the road by an overwhelming Amherst squad, dropping the match by a final tally of 3-0. Other league results on the same night, however, paved the way for the clinching of a playoff spot.

With all said and done, the Camels, holding a 4-10-2 NESCAC record, earned the 7th seed in the upcoming playoffs. The regular season did not end with the final conference game at Amherst. The University of Rhode Island came to town on Sunday the 19th for an exhibition match. This time Conn turned in a 3-0 shutout, blowing the Rams away. Kristen Van Slyke '08, Caroline Jeffrey '09 and Laura Gosnell '06 each struck the back of the net. Gabby Petrill '06 and Emma Greenman '09 combined for 8 stops in the shutout effort. The Camels will continue their season this coming Saturday at Bowdoin. The puck drops at 1:00pm, so gas up your Jeep and get an early start on the drive.

Swimmers Place 5th at NESCACs

By GERALD WOLS

sports writer

When I reflect on my time at Connecticut College it is hard to think of a team that has performed outstandingly well year in and year out. One team comes to mind, however—Women's Swimming and Diving. Led by a Coach who brings out the best in his team and drives them to accomplish all that they are capable of doing, and more, the team excelled this year and once again achieved exceptional results. Although their record might not seem as impressive as it did the past two years, focusing on meet for meet analysis, the women have been swimming against tougher opposition and therefore have not won as many meets as in the past. Their individual performances and the general performance as a team, however, has greatly improved.

"The women displayed great heart and really came together in team effort. We raced very well and saw some incredible time drops and gutsy performances," said a very proud Coach Benvenuti.

This years NESCAC Championships were hosted in Brunswick, Maine by Bowdoin College. The Camels did outstandingly well, matching their highest ever placing at the Championships. Conn finished the meet with 808 points which placed them in 5th place overall, a mere 19.5 points ahead of Colby College, which turned out to be quite the finale. Three Camels earned All-NESCAC

A mix of freshman talent and upperclassman experience has been key for the Camels' best-ever finish at the NESCAC Championships (Mitchell).

Honors and two CC swimmers provisionally qualified for the 2006 NCAA Swimming and Diving Championship. Five school records were shattered along the way. It was always going to be a tough meet for the Camels without their inspirational leader Kate Kovenock, who was lost to graduation last year. A top half finish is truly a remarkable finish for this young and very talented team.

Williams College won the championship with a score of 1878.5.

Middlebury, Amherst and Tufts rounded out the top four finishers. The hosts came in at the number seven position followed by Hamilton, Wesleyan, Bates and Trinity making up the rear.

Junior Ali Wilson paced the Camels with a third place finish in the 1650-yard freestyle, garnering All-NESCAC honors with a time of

Camels Fall To Lord Jeffs In First Round

Despite an early exit from the NESCAC Tournament, the Conn men's basketball team will boast the same starting lineup in 2006-07 (Mitchell).

By SPENCER TAICH

associate sports editor

After the men's basketball team finished last in the NESCAC in 2005, the Camels had nowhere to look but up. Their fans were not disappointed this season, as a vastly improved Conn squad put together one of their best seasons in years, and laid down the groundwork to improve even more over the next few seasons.

The most noticeable improvement was Conn's first post-season game since 2002. The Camels were able to advance to the post-season by winning their final two NESCAC games of the year against Bowdoin and Wesleyan.

Drawing a number eight seed in the NESCAC playoffs after finishing the season 13-11, the Camels found themselves tipping off against the seventh ranked team in the nation, the Amherst Lord Jeffs. The Lord Jeffs had dominated NESCAC competition all season, losing only one conference game while on their way to finish the regular season with a 23-2 record.

Early on in the game, the Camels gave the top-seeded Lord Jeffs a scare as they refused to go away. Throughout the early stages of the first half the Camels hung tough with one of the strongest teams in the nation, as they nearly matched the Lord Jeffs bucket-for-bucket through the first eight minutes of the game. Jeff Young '08 hit his first four shots as he provided the Camels with an early offensive spark.

The physical play of the Lord Jeffs eventually landed the Camels into foul trouble early as Sokul Zejnnullahu '07 and Charles Stone '08 both picked up three fouls each in the first half. The Lord Jeffs' offense found its stride in the final ten minutes of the first half going on a 13-3 run and entering the half with a 44-28 lead.

The second half began as the first half ended with as the Lord Jeffs' offense exploded to extend their lead to 22 points in the first five minutes of the second half. Despite the 52-30 lead, the Camels refused to quit as they put together their own scoring run to close the deficit to 52-37.

Unfortunately, that was as close as the Camels would get, as Amherst tallied thirteen unanswered points while on their way to a 74-48 victory. Young led the Camels with 16 points and Stone and Zejnnullahu combined for 15 boards.

Despite the loss, the playoff appearance shows that Conn basketball is headed in the right direction under the guidance of fourth year coach Tom Satran. The team has made considerable strides in terms of offensive production and turnovers. With only one graduating senior on the roster, the Camels will look forward to having the same starting lineup take the floor at the start of next season.

Charles Stone will be looking to improve on his impressive sophomore season, where he finished second in the NESCAC in field goal percentage at 58.9%, third in rebounding with 8.2 boards per game, and ninth in scoring with 15.6 points per game. The Camels' greatest strength this year came from their ability to make shots from beyond the three point arc, hitting them with a 42% accuracy rate, ninth best in the nation. Perhaps more remarkable, the distribution of shots was extremely well-spread out between all members on the floor. The Camels surely sent a message by reaching the tournament this year, and will build upon this season's failures and successes.

With almost the entire team returning next season, the Camels will undoubtedly be a force to be reckoned with in the NESCAC, as they look to bring back to the glory days of a program that went to the Division III final four in 1999. With the talent that Satran has put together, and the way in which his team has come together in a relatively short time to produce wins over other NESCAC opponents, the future looks bright for the Conn men's basketball team.

Man, The Knicks Stink

A popular gift this Christmas in my family was the book, "50 Jobs Worse than Yours." Everyone got a kick out of it and it provided lots of laughs, but it is not factually accurate. The worst job was not G.M. of the New York Knicks, but it should be. Standing at 15-38 as of Thursday, the team is terrible and its future does not look much brighter. Isaiah Thomas has gotten himself into a situation so bleak that it has become almost laughable. His squad consists of undersized big men and underachieving swingmen, none of which are particularly helpful in any area and all of which are vastly overpaid. Not only is the last-place team in arguably the worst division in the NBA, but also it has the highest payroll in the league by more than $20 million. The situation is compounded by the fact that several of the overpaid players are under contract until 2010. To make things even worse, they traded away every draft pick in the foreseeable future for Eddy Curry. Two first round picks and two second round picks in the next three years could really help any team, especially considering the likely position of those picks given the Knicks' record. On one hand, the fact that Isaiah still has a job as the General Manager of New York's professional basketball franchise must be a testament to just how good he was as a player. He was really good, and that must partly explain how he kept his job after signing Jerome James to a five-year $30 million deal this summer. But even his prowess as a player cannot help him much longer. His moves have been truly baffling and I do not see how the Knicks could keep him around much longer if he does not come up with something to fix the mess that he has created. The young players he drafted (Channing Frye, Nate Robinson and David Lee) have shown some promise but do not appear to be the complete solution. Frye could be a good player or maybe even an all-star, but he is not winning a championship anytime soon with Jamal Crawford, Quentin Richardson and Jalen Rose at the two, three and four. On Thursday, Isaiah took what he hopes will be the first step towards restoring competitiveness in the Knicks. He traded Trevor Ariza, a decent prospect who had fallen out of favor with Larry Brown, and Penny Hardaway to the Magic for Steve Francis. Even if Francis is past his prime as his numbers suggest, Isaiah accomplished a few things with the deal. He got rid of Hardaway's $15 million contract and got a much better player in return. Of course it is wrong that Francis and Stephon Marbury make up the league's most expensive background and neither plays the point, but at least the team has made a commitment to getting scoring from its guards. It may be unconventional, but the prospect of facing two scorers of their caliber could be daunting to some teams. While the Knicks got a bargain in Francis for two players that contributed minimally, the

If you've been following the latest and up to date of the NBA then you'll get this easy riddle: In how many different ways can Knicks GM Isiah Thomas skin a cat? One. The wrong way. Two weeks ago I made that observation and somehow it seems like nothing's changed. I mean just when you thought a man could do no more harm...BAM! He goes out and cooks up another disaster. First came the trade for Jalen Rose and now this pathetic attempt at a "recipe for success." Without a doubt, this trade for Steve Francis just adds to the growing list of follies committed by Knicks GM (I believe in his case that stands for "Going Mad") Isiah Thomas. The rumor out there right now is that Thomas is stockpiling pieces for a mega-trade which would land Kevin Garnett in New York. Under any other circumstances I would applaud such a move, but with Thomas, you just don't feel confident that he a) knows what he's doing, and b) knows how to manage his assets. The idea of stockpiling pieces is very nice, but when those trade chips are guys that nobody in the league wants, well, then your team goes from bad to worse. For now, I'll refrain from criticizing Thomas anymore, since maybe there's some light at the end of the tunnel. But didn't I say the same thing back when they got Marbury, or when Van Horn finally started to play well, or when... well you get the idea.

Moving on to the Winter Games, where it appears that the controversial comments of Bryant Gumbel, made on February 7th, are slowly leaking out. I want to address his remarks piece by piece as I believe there are five points that deserve some discussion. About two weeks ago, Gumbel, on the claim that the events at Turin hosted the best athletes in the world, made the following remark: "...So try not to laugh when someone says these are the world's greatest athletes, despite a paucity of blacks that makes the Winter Games look like a GOP convention." First and foremost, the fact that there are no black athletes at the games does not make them look like a G.O.P. convention. Such a statement is poor on Gumbel's part not only because he has unfairly labeled the political choice of a number of athletes at the games, but also because his statement will merely add fuel to a fire that we must put out. In making such a statement, which had complete disregard for its future implications, Gumbel has now opened the doors for a pedestrian and silly argument as to what other areas in sports does the same situation exist for whites? Already Michael Wilbon of PTI has pointed out that in five of the last eight All-Star games there has been no white representative. Should, as a number of white people have already claimed, they not watch the NBA All-Star festivities because athletes of their race are underrepresented? Should black people ever bother to tune in to the game of hockey, a sport where one can almost count the number of minority players in the entire league on two hands? The
