Connecticut College

DEDICATION

What is most striking about Miss Mulvey is her vigor. Her lectures flash with spontaneity, as she darts between blackboard and desk, sharp eyes rebuking the inattentive student. For Miss Mulvey history is not dull; nor are her students permitted to find it so.

Miss Mulvey's force in the classroom is paralleled by her involvement almost everywhere. It is not unusual to find a queue of students waiting outside her office for a moment of discussion or advice. A conscientious volunteer, she spends many further hours at meetings of the committees guarding the interests of the college.

Distinguishing Miss Mulvey from the simple altruist is the penetrating intellectual curiosity which she looses in so many directions. Not only does she make it a point to hear guest lecturers, but she attends film classes regularly to satiate her interest in film. Finally, late at night, just before the library closes, one might find her engrossed in an abstruse journal or foreign newspaper.

In sum, Miss Mulvey is an exemplary member of our college community — a superior professor, an active contributor, and an avid student. Connecticut College owes its integrity to such individuals. It is with great admiration and affection that we dedicate Koiné 1979 to

FACULTY

What is the reward? Surely a powerful desire to learn binds the professor to academics. His pay is the simple opportunity to study. But together with the precious hours of study come the many hours of teaching, when the professor is no longer student, and when those who are students may be less eager to learn. The price of study is the ceaseless obligation to teach.

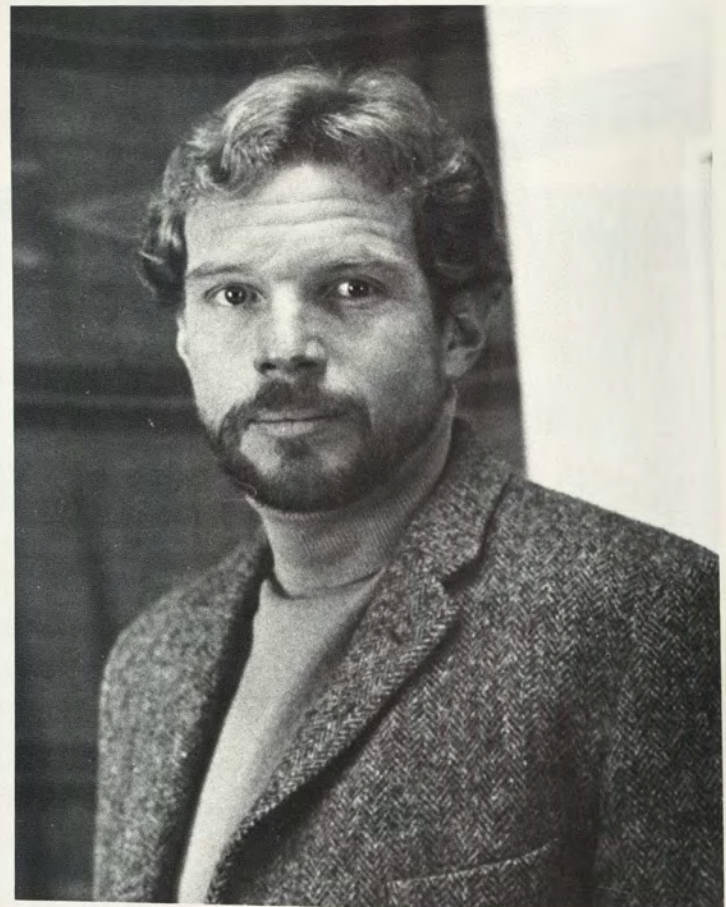

Still, there is a final reward for the professor, a dividend as valuable as any. Among the student body will be an inevitable few, every year, who genuinely share the professor's commitment to learn. With such students, the professor need not be alone. The tireless task of teaching becomes a bond of cooperation and discovery between two similarly drawn; and one simply leads the other. Such moments must be as satisfying as they are rare.

The Classy

What were our reasons for coming?
There were many.

Our reasons were traditional, ringing hollow. They amounted to justifications — rationales to continue according to a given plan, a premise on which we build.

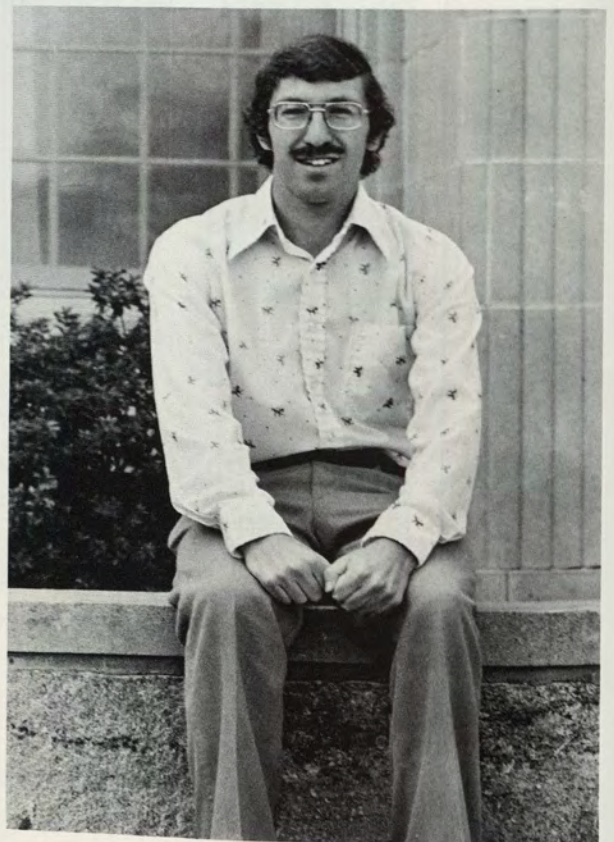

If there is a reason it lies buried in the tendency of individuals to follow the established course, on faith. It was the project of others before us, and we made it our project too.
